The Emperor's New Clothes

This is the Fairy Tale of The Emperor's New Clothes Story. It has been adapted from the tale by Hans Christian Andersen

There once was an Emperor who loved wearing fancy new clothes. Three times a day he would change into a brand new royal outfit. Many Emperors spend their days talking to advisers and fixing problems. Not this one! He was too busy sending out his servants to find the next great outfit to wear.

One day two strangers came to town. They said they were weavers. They said the cloth they wove was the finest anyone would ever see. But in fact, they were not weavers - they were crooks.

These fake weavers said their cloth was more beautiful than any other cloth but it could not be seen by just anyone. Only people who were smart and the most excellent could actually see the magic cloth. People who were not smart and not excellent - well, they would see nothing at all.

The Emperor thought, "I am the most smart and the most excellent Emperor! Anyone can tell by how grand I always look! I do not need to worry about that silly magic."

So the Emperor went to see the two weavers. These clever crooks ran about their shop, pointing at empty corners and tables. They said with pride, "Look at these piles of fine cloth! Surely you have never seen colors as bright as these, patterns as beautiful!" The Emperor could not understand - he did not see any cloth, anywhere!

The Emperor thought, "I cannot let anyone know that I cannot see this magic cloth! Who knows what they may think of me!" So instead, he said, "Indeed! This is the most beautiful cloth anyone has ever seen!"

As it turns out, the Emperor's grand annual Parade was coming up soon. This was a special day when everyone in the kingdom lined up to admire the Emperor and cheer him as he walked by. This year the Emperor wanted an outfit more fine than ever before. It must be made from the weaver's wonderful cloth!

(..) On the morning of the Parade, the Emperor came to the weaver's shop. He felt sure that this time he would be able to see the magic cloth. But still, the Emperor saw nothing!

When it was time for the Emperor to get undressed, the clever crooks said, "These clothes are so light and airy it will feel as if you have nothing on at all." And indeed, that is how it seemed to the Emperor! For when he looked in the mirror, he saw in the reflection that he was wearing nothing. But he thought, really, he must be wearing a very grand outfit.

At the Parade, the Emperor walked tall and proud. Each person who saw him thought, "I cannot believe what I am seeing! The Emperor is wearing no clothes!" But each person said nothing. They knew that only people who were smart and excellent could see the magic clothes. So instead they cheered, "There goes the Emperor! Doesn't he look fine!"

All of a sudden, one little boy said, "Look! The Emperor has no clothes!" Then another child said, "Look at him! He has nothing on at all!"

Then someone laughed. And someone else. Then more and more people started to laugh.

"Oh dear!" thought the Emperor. "Now everyone knows I could not see the cloth! They will know I didn't speak up because I was afraid of what people would think of me. What will they think of me now?"

But the Parade must go on. And so the Emperor continued to walk. And the servants behind him continued to hold high the train that wasn't there.
